

anything into law. 30 days seems more than enough time to wait. And I still say just because it seems one judge has decided that this was unconstitutional, what we already had in place, why aren't we going after putting language into the law then that says that unless the father makes an attempt to put some process into place as the individual, because it's nine months that you're pregnant and most everybody would be aware of it five or six months down the road, so you'd have a period of months before the birth of the child, plus a week after the birth of the child to start something in place, if you were the biological father, to say I'm the biological father and whatever decisions are going to be made with this child I want to be included in that. Why aren't we putting something into law that states that instead of getting into the process here and putting three months of waiting for them? And I still say we are just facilitating a decision by an individual, male individual to completely absolve themselves of their actions, and not only saying that's all right, but saying if a child results from this action, we will put into law safeguards so that if you want to, within three months period of time, say that you want some rights over this child, that we'll allow you to do so. I guess it still hasn't been explained to me why that's necessary, and I hope... I guess it's some attorney because to me as an individual who's not an attorney, the responsibility starts with the individuals who initiated the creation of that child. And that's... and if they're not around when that child is born I think the courts clearly are making the wrong decisions, and I don't know if that's based on the law that we have or based on some liberal judges out there. But I think we're heading in the wrong direction by requiring the mother to declare who the father is and to publish her name and his name and all these other requirements that we're making. And I hope people are going to consider that very carefully, and I know they are. Thank you.

SPEAKER WITHEM: Thank you, Senator Crosby (sic). You had said, Senator... excuse me, Senator Witek. You had said originally you were going to yield some time to Senator Bromm, is that still applicable? Senator Bromm.

SENATOR BROMM: How much time, Mr. Speaker?

SPEAKER WITHEM: Two minutes.

SENATOR BROMM: Okay, thank you. As this bill moves along or as
